Following publication of the original article [1], the authors pointed out that Springer Nature had made an error in its production of the manuscript with an uncorrected error in the final part of the Conclusions section. This originally appeared as:

“To be able to inform policy and clinical practice, well done and robust studies are sorely needed to assess. If ENDS substitution is a worthwhile harm reduction option for people who smoke.”

This has now been updated to:

“To be able to inform policy and clinical practice, well done and robust studies are sorely needed to assess if ENDS substitution is a worthwhile harm reduction option for people who smoke.”

The original article has been corrected.
